

Total eclipse of the moon, or: Why the Twin-Towers reappeared in 2007

Samstag, 3. März 2007

Last night, many of you had the chance to watch a total eclipse of the moon. Wherever the skies were clear, a bright, orange-red full moon showed up around midnight, as seen in Lausanne, Switzerland (picture above, taken from SPIEGEL online).

What I found even more fascinating than watching our pale companion, was the fact that the World Trade Center seems to have been reappeared lately.

When I read the article on SPIEGEL online this morning and skipped through their slideshow, I stumbled across a picture provided by Reuters showing the orange-colored full moon over some twin-towers bearing a striking resemblance to the "World Trade Center"; that is widely known to have been destroyed in a terrorist's attack on 9/11, 2001. The byline just says "a red moon over Manhattan", but the slideshow is dated "March 4, 2007". Funny, it would have been so easy to just drop a note saying this is an older photography to gain a little bit of reliability and confidence. But so we have to remain saying: "Don't believe it just because it's in the news"
